

Editorial.....

Man And Society

Mind and society both are two sides of a coin. Man is a social animal and group of people form a society. No one can fulfill the needs without living and interacting with society. It is society which converts a living creature in an intellectual human being.

When we analyse human life we find two fundamental grounds for analysis. They are:

- (a) Biological basis and,
- (b) Social basis

On the basis of these fundamental grounds a human creature, which is entirely tabula rasa at the time of birth, becomes a perfect human being. Some genetic attributes are inherently found in him and so many characteristics are developed while interacting with the society. It means to say that society plays a pivot role in developing him as a perfect social entity.

Therefore, we can say that society is the base of social development. We have ample examples in this regard. We can find that only having the biological characteristics in a person does not enable him to interact with the society. In addition, it can also be opined that a society cannot develop a person unless and until a biological human entity is not obtained.

Thus, it is surely fair to say that mind and society are interrelated and no one can imagine any of them alone. We have carried and are still carrying this vision in our consideration and regard senior intellectuals with budding brilliance to grace our journal by their precious and valuable contributions. Journals will determine its height by your cooperation and we will always appreciate your endeavour here. We will feel strengthened by your contribution which will make us able to run the Journal.

Aradhana Shukla
Anubhuti Dubey
Dr. Basant Kumar Soneber