

Editorial.....

Man Mind And Society: A Close Bonding

Humans and society are intertwined. Man is a social animal and it is man (human being) which constitutes the society. Nobody can fulfill the basic needs without entering in the mainstream of society because a person is developed as a social and cultural being only living in the boundaries of socially developed personality which is sherry dependent on society to satiate the needful. On the other hand no society is possible without humans.

When we analyses the human life we find two based of analysis. They are: biological and social. Keeping both in a single frame a man becomes a social animal. At the time of birth he is accompanied only by hereditary and other genetic qualities but it is society which develops and polishes him in the form of a social animal. Therefore, we can claim society is the groundwork of social development.

We have ample examples which state that even with biological traits a person can never be a “person “.Without entering the contribution of social components in his life. This reality is also true for society. No society can be shaped (or at least formed.) without entering the humans.

Therefore, it is surely fair to say that there is a close bond between man and a society.

Keeping the views in consideration we had started this venture, “Mind And Society “.We have encouraged by the valuable academic support by researchers and professionals. We hope that we will be supported by your contributions and carry on our endeavours through your support.

Professor Aradhana Shukla
Professor Anubhuti Dubey
Dr. Bassnt Kumar Soneber