Society and Behavior

Behavior is the outcome of thinking and perceiving on the basis of which something happens or at least changes (keeping the circumstances the same). It is the combination of an individual's thoughts and feelings (internal aspect) and the environment, including people (external aspect). Thus, it is the range of actions and mannerisms made by the individual, organism, system, or artificial entry into the same environment. These systems can include other systems or organisms as well as the intimate physical environment.

Moreover, it is a universally accepted truth that all human behavior depends on the individual's self, its acceptance of reality, and the social circumstances. Truly, the behavior develops through the enhancement of experiential varieties in social settings and encounters as well. This leads to an individual's behavior, which makes up the social factors. These social factors create the groundwork for communication in society, as revealed in the comprehension of another individual's gesture, which is part of society. The responding individual is the self, and the individual to whom the response is being made is society. Thus, communication is the bond that can be explained together, and it bridges the gap between the human mind and society.

Basically, it was the ground notion upon which the walls of our journal were made and are progressing still yet. We are committed to analyzing the relationship between the differentials of the human mind and the various spectrums of society. We have completed a long journey with your full cooperation and support. We will always be blessed to receive your valuable support through the research papers. They mean a lot to us. Keep your support always.
